The following e-mail was sent to DIRECTV employees on February 26, 2002:

The following message is from DIRECTV Chairman and CEO Eddy Hartenstein.

To DIRECTV Employees:

Today, EchoStar and HUGHES announced a plan for the merged company to deliver local broadcast channels in every one of the 210 television markets in the United States.

Since the merger was announced, a small team of DIRECTV and EchoStar employees have worked together to develop a technical plan to offer local channels in all 210 television markets nationwide. After an examination of each company's spectrum and satellite assets, the team determined the plan could become a reality.

The merger is expected to eliminate 500 channels of duplicative programming that DIRECTV and EchoStar each offer today. By combining all of our spectrum, all of our existing and planned satellites, and by adding another spot-beam spacecraft, we expect to have the ability to offer consumers in all fifty states access to all of their local broadcast channels.

The efficiencies gained from the merged company are also expected to result in the provision of affordable satellite-based broadband competition to cable modem and DSL offerings. Ultimately, the merged company expects to eliminate the "digital divide" - the households that currently do not have access to high-speed Internet and data services.

EchoStar and HUGHES filed a joint application with the FCC last night that detailed the "All Channels, All Americans" plan, whose rollout would be expected to be completed within 24 months of merger approval. The plan has been summarized in detailed booklets being disseminated to key lawmakers on Capitol Hill today, and the national version and press release are attached for your information.

I recognize that many of you still have questions about the merger - in particular, how it will affect the future of DIRECTV, and your jobs. Both Roxanne and I are committed to clarifying unresolved issues and communicating in greater detail with you regarding the merger status, approval process, and other events, such as today's announcement.

In the meantime, I thank each of you for your continuing efforts to successfully grow and continually improve the DIRECTV business.

Sincerely,

Eddy
